AT THE CHURCH GATE.

Although I enter not, Yet round about the spot Ofttimes I hover, And near the sacred gate With longing eyes I walt Expectant of her.

The minster bell tolls out Above the city's rout
And noise and humming.
They've hushed the minster bill. The organ 'gins to swell. She's coming! She's coming!

My lady comes at last, Timid and stepping fast And hastening hither, With modest eyes downeast. She comes! She's here! She's past! May heaven go with her!

Kneel undisturbed, fair saint! Pour out your praise or plaint Meekly and duly. I will not enter there To sully your pure prayer With thoughts unruly.

But suffer me to paco Round the forbidden place, Lingering a minute, Like outcast spirits who walt And see through heaven's gate Angels within it.

GOSPEL OF TRUTH.

Percy Lennox was sufficiently plqued by the calmness with which pretty Mlss Graham had accepted his attentions to wish to rouse her, even to hurt her. This unworthy desire he did not acknowledge to himself. He merely acted in furtherance of its indulgence. Afterward he told himself that he had erred simply because he had been carried away by the glrl's own high sounding theories. "The woman tempted me," he apologetically whispered.

The Macdonald Castle was nearing England. Four and twenty hours more and she would be rid of her passengers. What tlmo of residence remained to them upon her was occupied in the settling up of affairs. Bits of needlework were receiving finishing tonohes, books were being hastily pernsed to a close, gambling debts satisfied and flirtations carried to various elimaxes.

Lennox and Miss Graham came to tho end of an important conversation, which had been confessional so far as the man was concerned, somewhat lamely.

"You said the other day that you would always have the truth at whatever price," he remarked. "I have given it to you. Are you glad?"

"I am glad," she answered firmly, though she did not, as was her enstom, look up into his eyes as she spoke.

"Is thore anything more to be said?"

She was still calm—far too calm to please him. He was vexed that in propertion to her imperturbability his own emotions became roused.

"Nothing—so far as you are concerned. But for myself"-"For yourself?" he repeated eagerly, altering his position involuntarily in response to a movement on her part. "For myself; but that need not matter," was her reply as she rose. She gathered her needlework together and moved off. "I have a lot of packing to do," she explained as sho left him. "Mother insists."

During the journey from Sonthampton to Waterloo tho next day ho occnpied his imagination and thinking powers, such as they were, with visious of and ruminations concerning the girl he had returned from the Capo to marry. Daisy Thornton filled the vacnum left by Mary Graham, and filled It with snnshine and gayoty. Lennox tossed his head backward and laughed with content when one of his visions was realized, and on the arrival platform be saw his fiancee, proud in the consciousness of smartness of form, feature and toilet, waiting his appearance.

"There you are, darling!" he cried as he sprang from the train almost before it was stopped and grasped her arm. "A sight for soro eyes!"

"Percy!" she remonstrated, though her own upturned face had begged the rosounding kiss he presently gave her. It was the first of many she received between then and their arrival at her father's house at Gypsy Hill, whither she ressed her fervently, asking her to tell him instantly upon what day he might call her in very trnth his own precious

"Let's have our holiday first," sho pleaded with some lack of compliment. "The wedding's to be a week before yon and I go back together to Capo Town. I shall be seasick all the way. I know I shall."

He kissed her again and told her not Daisy's fear. He passed to renewed and with such devotion that her consolence pricked her, and she registered a half but to hide from him a certain lapse that had oconrred during his absence in her loyalty to him, she would tell him on her new life unbardened by any secret. This she would find a difficulty ln doing, apart from the natural unpleasantness of confessing snoh a thing, owing to hor relative position and Percy's, which for many months before their engagement had been that of cat and mouse, or, as Daisy herself expressed it, 'she would and sho wouldn't." Daisy, her father's only daughter, had at first considerably looked down upon young Lennox, his overseer at the boot factory in Houndsditch. His persistence and her parent's high opinion of his business abilities had, however, prevailed, but not to cause the girl to abandon a convletion of her own immeasurable superiority in every particular.

It is almost always a mistake for a person on a pinnacle to descend voluntarily from that point of vantage. Daisy Thornton, weary in mind and physically ill, retired to her own room, after making confession to her lover, to reallze this truth. A fortnight of the three weeks that were to clapse before their marriage had sped by, and Lennox was on the next day going up to Manchester to see a married sister who lived there, was a very simple one, a very innocent one, and Lennox, had his own mind been absolutely free of reproach, would have laughed the tale to merry scorn and kissed away the tears that glistened on the eyelashes of his whilom queen. Nevertheless, the very innocence of the recital annoyed him now, for growing up in his mind was a realization of the internal workings of matters that had before appeared to him stupidly simple. Business success seemed no longer tho fulfilment of every aim. He was hannted by Mary Graham's foolish notions, particularly by the one that claimed not Daisy Thornton. truth to be worth the world and its more really cross, "put out" his fianceo alighted from the ear. would have expressed it, than he had ever been-not with her, but even with any one. What was deserting him was the saving characteristic of his classthe knack of letting things slide. He was becoming critical. Ali the opposite sides were revealing themselves to him and with this annoying clamor for truth, which he did not understand, ringing In his ears the eyes of his mind were oonfused and know not what they saw.

In such a mood ho went to Manchestor and there accidentally met Mary Graham. Ho met her with a mlnd in which the humillty that had last dominated it on board the Maodonald Castle was revived. Ho found that she was teaching in a high school. Her position rooms she and her mother occupied them. were poor; but, in the estimation of Percy Lennox, It was beneath the one he occupied.

This pleased him. In the old days when he had first of all aspired to Daisy Thornton he had recognized her snperiority to himself without a pang, for then he had judged every standard by looking down upon him on the Macdonald Castle, though at the time of their acquaintanco this thought had never afflicted him. Travel had dimmed the hidden sorrow. old conventional faiths, but they had upon his arrival in England again.

Sho was looking a shado paler than when they had parted, but otherwise prettier than ever, for her compiexion was still more dazzlingly fair into her eyes, until she bade them becomo expressionless, a look of glad snrsurpassing beauty.

It was on a tram car that the rencontre took place. The one vacant seat there was that into which Lennox subsided by Mary's side. Mary songht to mitigate the forbidding repulsion of the glance conducted him, for in the train he ca- after the first soft one of weicome by polltely bowing and hoping he was with characteristic eagerness took it. The girls rare beauty and exquisite refinement intoxicated him, and with sndden clarity of convietlon ho nnderstood that truth was indeed worth the world and the world's wealth and put his conviction to practical utility.

"No," said he in response to a further question from Mary, "I am not to talk about the voyage. His shrng of married." He led her to suppose he was the shoulders sought to dispel the vision | not going to be by a movement of his of Mary Graham rather than that of mouth and the sudden turning aside of his head, not a premeditated deccit, but fervent admiration of his chosen one one of which he took advantage when the passing of the conductor made conversation once more possible, and a visiwow that, though she had determined | ble relaxation in his companion's mannot to make mountains out of molehills, nor assured him that she believed him a free man.

"I have been thinking a-mnch of what we used to talk about on board all at a convenient season and set forth | the Macdonald Castle," he proceeded gently. It was on his lips to say "a lot," but the expression was refused. Unconsciously he cleaned his mind of slang in her presence. He was his better self outwardly when she was by.

"Have yon?" she asked lamely.

Mary Graham began to feel uneasy. Though she was the woman of the Maodonaid Castle this bonrgcois at her side was not the man. Something had lowered him. She felt lt was so. Even her innate goodness and generosity forbade the denial of this fact. She began to look forward eagerly, as if to make suro that her destination was not passed. Lennox noticed the movement and recognized what it meant, and upon his part registered a vow to treat her mercilessly, to follow her if need be wherever sho went, to pester her with adoration, to wring from her a consent to marry hlm. The indifference of the early days on board the Macdonald Castle when he was wont to flirt patronwhen Daisy poured forth her tale. It izingly and for him quite pedantically with the little girl, as he called her to himself, had turned on hlm and was rending him with the flercest pangs of iove. With a bitter hate he thought of Daisy Thornton. Sho had enjoyed a brief interludo of amusement with a man one summer at Margate. The wretch had once even tried to hold her hand in his. What was she to keep him to a promise? She would find many a fellow willing to take her hand and her money, while he-Percy Lennoxwould be champion of the cause of truth. It was Mary Graham he loved,

There was a public park just opposite. Mary Graham led the way into it. "Now," she said, turning to Lennox, tell me what you want."

Then she again left him, overy limb vibrating to the painful beating of her

The next day at noon Lennox was back at Gypsy Hill. He had found a telegram awaiting him that evening at his sister's announcing the serious iliness and clear than It had been then, and of Daisy Thornton, who had been attacked with severe cold the day after his departure, and when he arrived at prise beamed which llt them up into his prospective father-in-law's house it was to learn that sho was suffering from pneumonia.

Strangely enough, this unexpected tnrn of events did not distress Daisy nor fill Lennox with remorse. Daisy was too ill to know how ill she was and sho had endeavored to flash at him lay in a kind of martyrlike stupor, half glad to suffer for that little Margate sin's sake, with the comforting convioweil. Lennox saw his opportunity and | tion that Lennox would accept the penanco and forgive fully and freely, while Lennox was existing, after the passion of what had passed, with a mind paralyzed into acquiescence for what was In store for him. The interlude indeed was welcome to the pair. Nelther for a moment doubted its brevity nor expected any ending to it but that of their wedding.

But it came to pass that the serious sido of the affair had at last to be broken to Lennox. With almost a tenderness the old Houndsditch boot and shoe maker told him one evening that there would be not the remotest chance of the wedding taking place before Lennox had to leave England. He added that though it seemed a crncl shame to say so his advice to Percy was to proceed to South Africa, whither he, her father, would bring Daisy when she was recovered from her illness and was able to travel so far.

Again Lennox accepted the inevitable with the snllen, unfoeling doggedness that had marked his hearing of Daisy's illness. So he departed, with no bitterness in his farewell to Daisy. in accord- difficult for suicides," he said.

"Yes. And what you said about trnth ance with the deeter's orders, but with the air and manner of a broken hearted man. At the end Daisy's father hesltated much as to whether ho should give or withhold a letter he had written o him concerning the real opinion of medioal men npon Dalsy's case. Utterly crushed and desolated himself, old Mr. Thornton was yet man enough to feel the deathlike blow that such a commnnloation would deal to one so shortly to have become a bridegroom. Yet he gave the letter to Lennox when he said goodby and told him to read it some time on hoard ship. "It was of no great consequence," he declared, soothing his own uncertainty as to whether ho ought or ought not to have deilvered it; "only a

Lennox changed the clothes he had worn on embarking to others when he got on board ship and left the letter in a pocket of the ones he discarded. It happened, therefore, that he never thought of Mr. Thornton's parting charge nutll he had been five days out at sea, and then It was only with a very lukewarm desire to read the epistle that he fetched it and took it up with hlm

It was a warm, weird evening. The snn had set behind bars of light cloud, which now were angrily red, while the sky itseif was lurldly, chriously colored. Lennox was oblivious to atmospheric influences. Had he been habitually prone to observations of nature he might have noticed an analogy between what he saw and his attltude of mind, for just as the sullen, brooding sky was so was he-sullen, brooding-and as the sullenness of that brooding was bound to end in rupture so was his.

The letter lay read beside him presently, and soon a puff of wind took it and carried it overboard. Lennox made no effort to recover it, but sat absolutely metionless, apparently unconscions of thought, but with a mind which quickly secthed with tunnlt, realization, regrets, maledictions, tumbling over one another in a verltable maelstrom of disorder. He had learned from the letter that there was not a shadow of hope that Daisy would recover. As his thoughts erystallized into recognizable concinsions he became aware that all his soul revolted with sickening disgust against the edict. It was not Daisy he regretted. She lay there, pushed aside into a corner of his mind, a poor corpse covered with her winding sheet, ent off from further consideration. Fronted him Mary Graham, her eyes sereno with judgment, her face ealmly conelusivo. No spoken words proceeded from those firm, red lips, yet Lennox knew his sentence. "Even if I went back," his miserable conviction ran, "she would not have mo." That was the trnth, and he was aware of it and was aware that no shuffling, no juggling, no miraclo, would compass alteration. "Curse the trnth," he muttered constantly, "curse it, carse it, carse it. And chance-curse that too. If I'd never met her in Manchester and lied to her and misled her and played the fool with her, I might have worked it. To think I should have been as near her then as I was only to loso her!"

He began to move about the deck, walking with curious twitched step, as if some impish gnome tripped him up as he went. His lips moved constantly, and now and then he spat words out. Ho blamed fate, ho blamed himseif. Ho looked back and could have died with the vehemence of his loathing for himself as he was now compared with himself as he had been, businesslike, selfishly careless, scheming, debonair, on board the Maedonald Castle, when he first met Mary Graham. Honor and he had made acquaintance when Mary had come into his life, and though he had battened the thing down, had turned a deaf ear to its tenching, had smothcred its rare falr face and trampied on its cleanly hands it lived to his undoing. "She wouldn't have mo now," he

He knew sho wouldn't. Mary was as dead and buried for him as Daisy was. Tho lurid sky, the steely sea, heaved to meet and demolish one another. The heavens seemed to Lennox to be pressing around him. He put up his hands to his head, afraid. Then an impulse took him to where a heap of rope lay coiled upon the deck. Ho mounted it and stood gazlng over at the water, his head nodding as if in motion with his body, but really in rhythm with the execrations that were tumbling and turning in his poor miserablo brain.

It was getting dark and cold. Down below and ovon on the deck the dinner bell clanged, now loud, now low. Lennox did not heed it, but still stood in foolish, unmeaning contemplation.

"A nast; looking night, sir," remarked a sallor whose acquaintance he had mado.

Lennox moved off a bit, but presently resumed his place. "The boll's gone some time, sir," the man observed, passing him again.

"Oh, lot it go," responded Lennox. The mere speaking of the words recalled hlm. He laughed a little and quickly tnrned. "I'm not going to jump over if that's what you mean," said he, shuffling off with some of his accustomed swagger. He turned his head over his shoulder and finng a parting jest at the man. "You make your boats too jolly

Down in the saloon his mood enanged. Ho became expansivo. A man with whom he had struck up a traveling comradeship received from him a half whimpering, quite pathetic history of his sad case—the ease, that Is to say, as affecting Daisy. He never mentloned Mary. A great deal of sympathy was expressed for him in the rough, odd way of men of his class. The two drank a lot together, and the companion encouraged Lennox in his disposition to gulp down much more than he usually did. He thought he had done a good night's work for Lennox when he assisted him to his berth, a mass of maudlln grief and tears.

"Wo'll make a day of lt, him and me, when wo land tomorrow at Funchal, " the kind creature determined.

They did make a day of it for other reasons than sorrow, for on the Macdonald Castlo coming up to Madeira a telegram was handed up directed to Lennox. This his friend took to him, where he lay, very wretched, in his berth.

"Read it," he commanded.

The man tore it open, and the inessago spoke:

"Daisy much better. We come by next boat."

"It's as well," Lennox was understood to remark. But his frlend did not see his face till he emerged on deck for the day's ontlng. Lennox had hidden it, and many more vehement curses, in his pillow. - Black and White.

One Light That Never Falls.

Every one must recognize the beauty and many advantages possessed by the electric light, but perhaps few have thought of the discomforts to which a large part of the population would be put if this most modern and perfect illuminant were to supersede all the older forms in use.

An exceient example of this is to be found in the large workroom of the reporters in The Sun office. In this room are scores of incandescent electric lamps, and no ono lacks for light, but at an odd corner there is always burning one little gas jet, whose light is insignificant, but dearer to the men who work about it than all tho electric lights in the Day and night, year in and year out, this gas jet burns with a fiame not more than halt an inch high and a quarter of an luch broad, and day and night it is the Mceea of overy man who resorts to tobacco smoking to soothe his nerves or kiii idlo moments. Everybody knows where to find a light for cigar, pipo or cigarette. But this was not true years ago when the electric lights took the place of the old gas jets which lit the room. With these open lights in profusion no one had ever found it necessary to keep a stock of matches at hand for starting a smoko. For many a day and night after the electric lights were established there were great hunts through the office for matches, and then finally it became the fixed enston to keep a gaslight going at a corner near the sporting desk to accommodate the smokers. - New York Sun.

Daudet and Animals.

Daudet had a lurking kindness for slnners. He pitied them, for he could not see how in the long run they could succeed in anything. But the self righteons were more offensive to him. I think he was right in saying that men and women who pass for having never sinned are unpleasant companions, and, from the day of judgment standard, perhaps the worst sinners of all. The sensibility shown in "Jack" and other works did not extend to animals. Daudet, though a cigalier, was deaf to the chirp of grasshopper and crieket. Birds have no place in his rnral sketches. He could not understand the tenching beauty of the "last friend" at the poor man's funeral. Animals were simply brutes to Dandet. At best they wero warnings to human beings not to live merely to eat, sleep and leavo posterity behind them. They sometimes were vices incarnato. Such were the fox, the serpent, tho seorpion. What a selfish, heartless thing the ant was! It had a head if you will, but it was the sort of head that organizes labor in sooty factory towns. The dog was the beastliest beast of any. Daudet fled from every drawing room where he saw a lapdog. -Paris Letter in London Truth.

Victor Smith tells this story in tho Now York Press: "My father was an old time lawyer. He tried a little case for his bootmaker and entered on tho books a charge of $15, the price of a new pair of boots. When the latter was delivered, the accompanying bill was $30. A man of any other profession would have taken offense at the apparent effort to "do" him, but the lawyer smilingly raised his fee to $45, and Mr. Smart Aleck Bootmaker had to pay. That was an arbitrary fee. Doctors sometimes enjoy the privileges of it."

THE CAROLINA POPLAR. .

It is Greatly Admired As An Ornamental Shade Tree.

The trees recently planted in the open spaces of the Esplanade under the directions of the Mayor and Council are supposed to represent a variety of poplar (populus angulata) which has been highly esteemed for many years by arboriculturists and amateurs as an ornamental shade tree peculiarly suitable for parks, drives and other public places. In some parts of this country, and notably in its Southern habitat, it attains a remarkable size, often rising to a height of sixty or seventy feet, with an elegant, well-proportioned trunk, and an expanded summlt of dark rich foliage airily and symmetrically dis-

It is said to have been introduced into Europe in the early part of this century, where, on account of its exceeding beauty as a shade tree, it has maintained an undiminished popularity to the present day. It is an especial favorite with the French. In the forestry department of the Paris Exposition of 1889, nothing attracted more attention than this elegant and stately tree. In the latitude of Paris, where the winters are sometimes very severe, the terminal brauches of this poplar are often destroyed by frost; but it possesses an exceptional vitality at heart, and being perfectly adapted to the climate in other respects, it is in universal demand as a shade tree, and imparts a peculiar richness and softness and finish NEW YORK, March 21.-Not content to the exquisitely wooded landscapes of with spreading fallacious reports as to the that country during the sunnier seasons ot the year.

Afraid of Dynamite.

The citizens of Helena are very much frightened over the repeated raids made on the tollgate situated in the center of that little village, and have asked the directors of the road to remove the gate outside to some other point, as they fear the raiders will use dynamite in blowing up the building. The directors have refused the request. The raiders partially wreeked the building last Friday night, as already stated, and threatened to use dynamite on their next visit.

Quite a Come Down.

FRANKFORT, KY., March 21.-The suit of the State against the Southern Pacific Company for franchise taxes since 1894 has been compromised. ## A CASE OF SMALLPOX.

A Negro Man Stricken With the Disease Near Minerva-Removed to the County Pest House.

Joseph Melville, a negro who came to this county about three weeks ago, and who has been working most of the time since then for Mr. Frank Boyd, Jr., near Minerva, was stricken with an attack of smallpox a day or so ago.

Dr. Adamson, of the Board of Health, was notified Mouday night and went out early Tuesday morning to investigate. in May. He pronounces it a genuine case of the disease.

Melville came here about three weeks ago from "Sausage Row," Cincinnati, according to his story, and was formerly from South Carolina.

He had been complaining for several days, and it is said attended a negro church at Minerva Sunday night. If this from $11 to $13.75 per hundred. is true, the physicians in that neighborhood should at once see that the people in the community are all vaccinnated.

Melville was removed last night about midnight to the county pest house in "Sleepy Hollow," south of the County Infirmacy, where the case has been completely isolated.

A meeting of the Health Committee of the City Council, the Board of Education and other city officials was held last night to take steps to prevent a visitation of the smallpox. An order for general vaccinnation was decided on. The teachers were directed to ask all school children to be vaccinnated.

Dr. S. M. Harover, City Physician, will vaccinnate all persons, and especially children, who are too poor to pay for having it done.

If the request for vaccinuation be complied with by our citizens, there will be ered at Richmond Tuesday. The railno dauger of a visitation of the disease. road agents at that place will not issue

No sadder duty has ever befallen to our lot than recording the death of this estimable woman. She was the daughter of Charles and Harriet Gerdon, born at the old homestead near Fera Leaf in 1841 and resided with her parents until their death about fifteen years ago; shortly afterwards coming to make her home with her sister with whom she had since resided. Early in life she united with the M. E. Church, South, and remained faithful to the day of her decease. Heaith she had never known; siekness and suffering, pain and anguish were her constant companious through life, yet amid them all she was ever eheeriul and uncomplaining; a faithful reader of the Bible and lover of its promises and teachings her faith in him who doeth ail things well never wavered. She died as she had lived, a true and faithful Christiau. But Emma has gone, her little frail body sleeps beneath the sod. No more does she greet us with her pleasant smile and cheerful voice, no more do we hear the pitiful eall for relief from those terribio pains, but in that land where paln and sorrow never come, where no shadows ever fall she rests in the sheltering bosom of him who said, "Come unto me all you that iabor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." What a dark world this would be if it were not for the hopo inspired by the thought of a great beyond where we shall 'know as we are known."

THE dyspeptic earries a dreadful load on his back. It seems as if he were really made up of two men. One of them ambitious, brainy and energetie; the other slek, listless, peevish and without force. The weak man weighs the other one down. The dyspeptie may be able to do pretty good work one day, and the next day because some little indiscretion in eating, he may be able to do nothing at all. Most eases of dyspepsia start with constipation. Constipation is the eause of nine-teuths of all human sickness. Some of its symptoms are sick and bilious headache, dizziness, sour stomach, loss of appetite, foul breath, windy belehing, heartburn, pain and distress after eating. All these are iudicative of deraugements of the liver, stemach and bowels, and all are caused by constitution. # The Mystery of Sleep.

[From the London Spectator.]

There is a remarkable fact connected with sleep which must not be overlooked. The sleep of a human being, if we are not too busy to attend to the matter, always evokes a certain feeling of awe. Go into a room where a person is sleeping, and it in the presence of the central mystery of existence. People who remember how constantly they see old Jones asleep in the club library will smile at this; but look quietly and alone at even old Jones. and the sense of mystery will soon develop. It is no good to say that sleep Is only "moving" because it looks like death. The person who is breathing so loudly as to person who is breathing so loudly as to take away all thought of death causes the silent Mr. Hudson, of Boone County, spent several sleeper, who hardly seems to breathe.

We see death seldom, but were it more familiar we doubt if a corpse would inspire so much awe as the unconscious and sleeping figure—a smiling, irresponsible doll of flesh and blood, but a doll to whom in a second may be recalled a proud, active, controlling consciousness which will ride his bodily and his mental horse with a hand of iron, which will force that body to endure toil and misery, and will make that mind, now wandering in paths of and children, of Shannon, and Mrs. Hattie Hart ruling, the saving, or the destruction of and son, of Flemingsburg, attended the funeral of their relative, Mlss Emma Gorden.
